Katya Abdulova to Give a Business-Programme Talk at "Tochka Cuire" — "Art as a Startup: Engineering Attention and Reality"

The business programme of the "Tochka Cuire" contemporary art festival will feature a talk by the festival's curator and producer, Katya Abdulova — "Art as a Startup: Engineering Attention and Reality." The date is to be confirmed.

ABOUT THE TALK

Business is used to defending itself against uncertainty with strategy sessions, plans and attempts to predict the future. The artist is the only professional who doesn't defend against uncertainty, but plays with it — and always wins: it's artists who create the image of the future and the reality each of us carries in our heads. The meaning of the most important words in our lives was invented by them — through books, films and paintings.

Nobody wanted an iPhone until Steve Jobs invented it, and it was impossible to declare love in Russian until Pushkin reinvented the language.

Launching the festival in Sary Oskol was the same kind of startup: zero budget, no cultural habit among the audience, and total unknown. "Tochka Cuire" came together not despite the context, but because of it.

The talk covers how directing tools, systems thinking and creative practice turn an "empty place" that doesn't exist on any map into a point of attraction for thousands of people; why contemporary art is really about the hard work of building communities; and how founders can stop searching for a magic "growth" button by learning not to fall apart in the silence of total uncertainty, and to create meaning where others see only industrial pipes.
